Clinically Studied CAPSAICIN

CAPSAICIN is the naturally occurring active compound in cayenne pepper, associated with many of the health benefits of cayenne pepper use. Clinical research supports the function of capsaicin and associated capsaicoids as weight management agents.^{1,2,3,4,5}

- Capsaicin ingestion increases energy expenditure and is associated with both increased and sustained fat oxidation.¹
- Both oral and gastrointestinal exposure to capsaicin increases satiety (feeling of fullness).²
- Capsaicin's role in weight management has been well researched as the center of more than 90 clinical studies.

Clinically Studied TEACRINE[®]

TEACRINE[®] is a dynamic patent-pending compound derived naturally from certain teas, exotic fruits and various coffee beans. TeaCrine's strong efficacy has been proven to facilitate a wide range of healthy benefits for thermogenic supplementation.^{4,7}

- TeaCrine works with the body's natural metabolic processes to deliver improvement in energy and fatigue reduction. By offering a smooth energy lift without irritability, the jitters, or a crash, it can be used advantageously to help break through plateaus and support stronger results.⁴
- TeaCrine has also been shown to heighten positive effects on mental focus and concentration, increase motivation, and support a positive mood. TeaCrine's effectiveness has been researched in preclinical and human clinical studies.⁴
