Adenosine 5'-Triphosphate

Adenosine 5'-Triphosphate (ATP) is a unique muscular energy source in that it is able to be utilized during both aerobic and anaerobic activity. ATP is responsible for each and every metabolic process that occurs within the body. It regulates all of our physiological activity through specific interactions with cellular receptors. In addition to being the primary fuel source in our muscle cells, ATP exhibits some unique Nitric Oxide increasing properties. ATP works to increase vasodilation by stimulating endogenous NO synthesis in striated muscle, and enhances the delivery of oxygen, glucose, and vital nutrients to skeletal muscles to immediately increase anabolism. In addition to NO synthesis enhancement, ATP also increases NO independent prostacyclin dilation and EDHF synthesis. This allows you to experience the massive pumps you desire, and huge muscle gains you demand. Clinical studies show that just a small amount of ATP in the blood can cause up to an 8% increase in blood vessel diameter, and a 17% increase in overall blood flow.¹

Benefits of ATP

- ATP stimulates glycogen building in skeletal muscles¹
- ATP increases vasodilation¹
- ATP increases oxygen flow & L-Arginine uptake¹
- ATP increases bioavailability of key nutrients¹

The fact of the matter is that ATP accomplishes all of these muscle building benefits and more without any adverse effects on your blood pressure or heart health. ATP is not a stimulant, and no side effects have ever been experienced when studied in clinical settings.¹
